CHAPTER XXVII THE END THEREOF The first object of the Allies was to free Europe from German tyranny. That has been accomplished, and I hope for a time so long that when Germany regains the power she will not have the desire to attack others. She will quickly begin again to produce, and it is to everyone's advantage that she should, for the immense loss of wealth can only be made good by work, and every hand is needed if we are to recover the abundance of commodities in which alone prosperity consists. There is no fear of crushing her. An industrial nation whose machinery is uninjured cannot be prevented from regaining prosperity, even if anyone was so foolish as to wish it. She will pay, and pay easily, any fine likely to be imposed upon her, will soon again be a thriving nation, and will not, in my opinion, remain republican. Her upper classes, who are both patriotic and capable, will be so much needed that they will regain influence, and will probably set up a constitutional monarchy. Republicanism is not in the German blood, and Germany as a whole will prefer the historical forms to which she is accustomed. But though this will be to some extent a danger, her larger classes will have much more power than before, and will be able to enforce the desire for peace inherent in all large industrial masses. The French would not have...
