Not illustrated. 1905 Excerpt: . . . furnish work, increase wages, force industrial growth and supply unlimited markets. Attempts have been made to meet the demands that it should do so. Every page of the enactments of Congress and the various state legislatures bear evidences of paternalism. CENTRALIZATION. Prior to the Civil War the average citizen hardly realized that we had a government at Washington, in so far as the action of that government affected his daily life. National and international affairs concerned him but little. His chief concern was with domestic and local affairs and these fell almost exclusively within the province of the state and local governments. The Civil War changed all that. During the last half century the national government has occupied an ever increasing proportion of public attention and public interest. National legislation and national administration have touched the people at every point. All eyes are directed upon Washington. All hopes center in Washington. The once powerful states legislatures have sunk to a position of comparative insignificance in public estimation. It is considered a matter of greater surprise when a man of first-rate ability, experience and means, offers himself, or permits the use of his name, as a candidate for legislative and local offices. A slow but sure process of centralization has gone on. The national government now occupies almost, if not all, of the debatable territory. And the end is not yet. IV. THE GROWTH OF RADICALISM. Opportunism, paternalism and centralization are the chief characteristics of the governmental...
